BOSTON • Scientists funded in part by the NFL have found evidence connecting head injuries in athletes to a condition that mimics Lou Gehrig's disease.

Dr. Ann McKee said she found toxic proteins in the spinal cords of three athletes who had suffered head injuries and were later diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, also known as Lou Gehrig's disease. Those same proteins have been found in the brains of athletes with chronic traumatic encephalopathy, a disease linked to head injuries that causes cognitive decline, abnormal behavior and dementia.

The findings are to be published in September's issue of the Journal of Neuropathology and Experimental Neurology.

McKee is a neurology professor at Boston University. She also is director of neuropathology for the Department of Veterans Affairs at the Bedford VA Medical Center, where research has been conducted head injuries from baseball and playing football at Columbia University might have contributed to Lou Gehrig's motor neuron disease. They say their research raises the question of whether the New York Yankees' Hall of Fame first baseman had CTE, rather than ALS — the disease that bears Gehrig's name.
